Will Liz Truss Show What Brexit Really Means For Britain?

A few weeks ago, after Boris Johnson resigned as UK Prime Minister, we published a column titled “Johnson’s Resignation Opens The Gate To A Real Post-Brexit Britain.” In that column we discussed the possible contenders for the leadership race, indicating Rishi Sunak and Liz Truss as the clear frontrunners. We also warned that, once that Brexit was “done” by Boris Johnson, the new Tory party leader and future PM will have to deliver on what Brexit will really mean for the country; in particular, by showing what benefits it could derive from leaving the EU.

This week, the leadership race will come to an end, with the election of Johnson’s successor by 161,000 Tory party members on September 5th. Liz Truss is widely expected to win the race. Sunak has been one of the most popular ministers in Johnson’s cabinet, widely praised for his sensible approach to the pandemic, which was epitomised in the furlough scheme that was launched to make sure that millions of people did not lose their jobs. But Truss has been a party member far longer than Sunak, and she is clearly favoured by the party grandees, as well as by the base. She comes from the party ranks, and can probably speak to the belly of the country better than Sunak can.

In spite of the humble origins of his family, Sunak would seem an elitist choice, considering his business studies at Stanford and his marriage with the daughter of one of the richest men in India. The fact that his wife was caught using a legal scheme to pay less taxes in the UK did not help. Sunak would speak to Britain’s minds. But in a period in which populism is still in vogue, speaking to the belly of the country goes a longer way than speaking to the mind. This is the reason Liz Truss will likely win the race.

We have already discussed the differences in policies between Sunak and Truss; a further comparison between the two can be found here. But there is an aspect of the difference between them that it is worth discussing in greater depth. Let us assume that Liz Truss wins the race. She is considered to be a die-hard Brexiter, with a level of zealotry that only “the converted” have (she voted to remain in the EU in 2016).

Truss reportedly wants to transform the UK in a sort of Singapore-on-Thames, with a super low tax rate. Hence, her proposal of reducing taxes by GBP 30bn from “day one” in office. She also wants to reduce the regulatory burden, to take advantage of the divergence in standards with the EU that the UK has gained from Brexit. She also wants to revisit the Northern Ireland protocol, which regulates the relationship between UK and the rest of the EU at the Irish border. In terms of economic policy, she is clearly in favour of tax cuts over “cash handouts.” But even Margaret Thatcher increased taxes (for example VAT), before announcing tax cuts, years later.

Some commentators say that “Liz Truss can do a lot of damage before she’s thrown out, as she will be, in 2024.” Others believe that, “If she wins, and enacts her promise of immediate tax cuts, the only safe prediction is that sterling will crash.” While we are somewhat concerned by her proposed policy, we believe that Truss is likely to show to the UK what Brexit really means, in both a positive and a negative sense.

The Quarter Ahead: DOJ Released Redacted Trump Mar-a-Lago Raid Affidavit; US Sent Two Warships Through Taiwan Strait

Department of Justice revealed redacted affidavit used to obtain a search warrant for Trump's home in Florida. The affidavit reports that the government had probable reason to believe that the search of Trump's Mar-a-Lago would turn up evidence of illegality. The warrant revealed that FBI was looking for materials demonstrating violations of laws against 'obstruction of justice and the removal of official records, as well as the U.S. Espionage Act'.

Two US Navy warships entered the Taiwan Strait for the first time since US-China tensions intensified. Washington said that its two guided-missile cruisers are making the voyage while demonstrating freedoms of navigation in accordance with international law.
